MORGAN FISHER RETROSPECTIVE TO OPEN AT THE WHITNEY
November 30–February 12, 2006

The exhibition is organized by Whitney curator Chrissie Iles, who notes, “Fisher’s early films are all constructed according to Conceptual, or ‘structural’ principles rather than narrative sequences, reflecting the shift away from conventional narrative and readings of sculptural and painterly space, materials, and time that were occurring elsewhere in the art world at the beginning of the 1970s.”
In Color Balance, three projectors superimpose identical images of a constantly moving Ping-Pong ball, filtered red, green, and blue. The installation enacts additive color mixing, but the projectors are not synchronized, resulting in an ever-changing play of primary colors.

Production Stills (1970) uses the equipment of Hollywood studio filmmaking to document its own production with a series of Polaroids whose repeated shape recalls the uniform modules used by Carl Andre and Donald Judd.

Projection Instructions (1976) tells the projectionist to do such things as turn off the sound and throw the image out of focus, acts that ordinarily would be disruptive. These actions by the projectionist connect the screen and the viewer back to an invisible performer attending to the invisible machine that is the origin of the image.

Fisher, a friend of the late artist Jack Goldstein, addressed Hollywood most directly in Standard Gauge (1984). An autobiography mainly about Fisher’s brief time as a film editor in Hollywood, the film presents scraps of found footage as a series of objects that reflect the history and technical aspects of the commercial motion picture industry, while also alluding to Fisher’s peers in independent filmmaking such as Paul Sharits and Hollis Frampton.

In Fisher’s most recent film (), insert shots taken from Hollywood films (for example, a close-up of a wristwatch) are “liberated” from their original, marginal role as conveyors of information essential to their stories, and given a central role, reassembled to form a chance succession of enigmatic, sometimes ominous, moments.
